TORY BURCH

In the dozen or so years that Tory Burch has been doing fashion shows, there have been few minidresses. Pencil skirts and full skirts with sweeping Claire McCardell-like volumes, yes, but rarely anything above the knees. That changed for spring 2024. "I'm not personally wearing the short hoop dress," modeled here in pink viscose jersey by her friend Emily Ratajkowski, Burch says, "but I wanted to really believe in it and love it, and I spent a lot of time challenging myself." Hoops of this sort were once used for crinoline rings; Burch said she likes the idea of turning what, once upon a time, held women back into something freeing. "Where women are today," Burch says, "they're coming into their own idea of their own sexuality, their individuality, and when you think about the landscape of how you address those needs, you need to have diversity." Thus, it wasn't all minis on her spring runway: Burch also showed leg-elongating pants in a coated jersey and nylon taffeta zip polos—pieces as utterly unencumbered as that little pink dress.—N.P.
