John Galiano, Maison Margiela

[My first] Chanel show was overwhelming—the adventure, the mischief, the encyclopedic knowledge about fashion of any period, any century. Karl was like an oak tree, by which I mean there was enormous wisdom. And I loved the way he ended each statement with a “non?”—as a question mark, to engage you, to see what your point of view was. You had to be ready for that “non?”! I focused on his obsession with the line during his tenure at Patou. The polka dots are cutouts, ellipses—we projected them onto the look, and they ended up [cut out] wherever the projection hit the surface of the dress. The sequins were a new way of doing embroidery: cutting them out, then dipping them in hot water to make them pliable, then into freezing water so they held their shape. They’re really fun but with—I hope—all the rigors of couture.

Worn by Natalia Vodianova.

NATALIA

After injuring herself in preparation for the Paris Half-Marathon last year, Natalia Vodianova has adopted a counterintuitive approach to training that takes pounding the pavement out of the equation altogether. "Last year I ran the marathon three times before actually running the marathon, and it messed up my knees. So now I stick to a daily routine of twelve sun salutations instead," says the devoted yogi. "Doing a pose like downward dog every day has also completely strengthened my back." (Now she looks as good going as coming.) At 29, the Russian supermodel and mother of three is hardly past her prime; nonetheless, her body isn't the same as it was when she started modeling at sixteen. "Standing next to an eighteen-year-old at a show, I realize my body has changed in certain places," says Vodianova, raising her arms as if for proof. She flaps vigorously, but nothing quivers. "Well, they did used to wobble," she says, a girlish grin spreading across her face. "That must be the yoga, too!"—C.N.
